

The Four Pantheons — Worshipper Sketches

Status: Definitive. All 52 under the four playstyle modes, plus the two Wild Cards and Shorash ("the 55th"). Rank 6 is Mode within rules (Covenant / Hearth / Healing / Crafting).

Organization: Suit-first. The rank view is a second presentation of the same material — see the grid below.

Related: Skyfall README, Four Pantheons Roster

Method

The roster gives each god's cold gloss — what the pattern actually is underneath. This document is the other layer: what worshippers believe, the crystallized personality that prayer built.

Under mass passive collapse, that second layer isn't decoration. It's the mechanism. A First Child enters a domain as an unshaped waveform; a population's belief supplies the shape; the FC then imbibes what it was given and behaves accordingly, reinforcing the belief that produced it. The gods below are not describing themselves. They are describing what enough people were certain of, for long enough, and then became.

Suit is playstyle. Rank is domain axis. The four suits are the modes the First Children chose:

Suit	Mode	Signature
Spades	Hard mode	Self-imposed restrictions, held without exception
Hearts	Social mode	Who is inside the thing, and who isn't
Diamonds	Systems mode	What was and wasn't entered
Clubs	Sandbox mode	Growth without design, and without a stop

Each suit has its own grammar, and the grammar is diegetic — worshippers describe their gods in the shape the mode produces:

- Spades resolve as a restriction the god will not break. "He has never granted a single request, to anyone, ever." The not-X-just-Y construction is native here and appears nowhere else.
- Hearts resolve on the boundary of the relation. "A third person present means she was never there."
- Diamonds resolve on the entry. "He doesn't ask whether the yield was fair, only whether the column closes."
- Clubs change direction mid-sentence and decline to close. "He blesses the departure, loses the traveler past the second ridge, and is already delighted by something else."

Two ranks are structural rather than topical:

- Rank 6 — Mode within rules: each playstyle as a standing practice that accepts a real rule-set and remains itself. Covenant (group standards) · Hearth (household we; hospitality is a tenant) · Healing (body as system — repair) · Crafting (make within the medium's rules).
- Rank 2 — Mode terminal: each playstyle where nothing further grows (see below the grid).

Design lines (author-facing) sit after Worship on entries that need them. They record cold gloss, rank job, cousins, and intended drift — not cult doctrine. Rank 6 carries them first; the rest of the file will gain them over time so every seat is read the intended way.

Names carry their Semitic root in each header, matching four-pantheons-roster.md — e.g. "Qorathiel (Q-R-H)." The root is the cold, FC-level pattern; everything below it in the entry is what worship did with that pattern.

FIT-TAG DEFINITIONS

Each entry is calibrated for fit — how closely the assigned personality matches the domain actually chosen. Every entry (except Shorash — see her note) carries exactly one of these three tags:

Tag	Meaning
(clean)	Worship built roughly what the domain implied. The god does what the name suggests, no gap between cold gloss and worshipped surface.
(seam)	Worshippers have recorded something their own theology has no slot for — a detail, a practice, or an inconsistency the cult itself can't account for. Not wrong, just unexplained.
(miscollapse)	Worship built something the domain never actually required, and a minority tradition (an older text, a cross-suit comparison, a practice that outlived its reason) still remembers what the "intended" reading would have been.

The miscollapses are where "man creates god" is doing its most visible work, and they're the best entries in the file — Chayelon (a health god who can only supply company), Kevodon (honor with the affection removed by four centuries of magistrates), Rabakhon (fertility collapsed into cold audit while Zerael, praying over the same ground in Clubs, came out warm) are the clearest examples.

Shorash carries no tag. She isn't shaped by worship the way the 52 are — her cult reveres function, not a portfolio, so there's no domain for belief to miscollapse against in the first place. See her entry, below the Wild Cards.

The Grid

Rank	Spades (Hard)	Hearts (Social)	Diamonds (Systems)	Clubs (Sandbox)
A	Qorathiel — Winter	Chadashiel — Spring	Asaphon — Autumn	Qayitzon — Summer
K	Harban — War	Shevachiel — Glory	Kevodon — Honor	Derorel — Freedom
Q	Tzaydon — Hunt	Ahavel — Love	Rabakhon — Fertility	Taturiel — Exploration
J	Sarphon — Fire	Demahel — Water	Aretzon — Earth	Sharaq — Air
10	Ya'aron — Forests	Midvaron — Deserts	Tzuron — Mountains	Bitzon — Swamps
9	Kochon — Strength	Chayelon — Health	Chakamon — Wisdom	Aromon — Cunning
8	Shevuon — Oaths	Sodiel — Secrets	Takanor — Law	Aravon — Chaos
7	Goralon — Fate	Chalufon — Trade	Mishpaton — Justice	Yetziron — Creativity
6	Shalalon — Covenant	Tzelahar — Hearth	Rifon — Healing	Harashon — Crafting
5	Motiel — Death	Yaladiel — Birth	Koseb — Elderly	Tza'iron — Youth
4	Sha'alon — Necessity	Pituyel — Seduction	Heteron — Bribery	Yayinon — Alcohol
3	Neshakon — Weapons	Takshiton — Jewels	Ashiron — Coins	Zerael — Seeds
2	Aritzon — Tyranny	Sha'ashon — Discord	Kefiron — Heresy	Riqqavon — Rot

Rank 6 — Mode within rules. Not a natural tetrad (seasons, terrains) but each playstyle given a standing practice inside a real rule-set: group standards, household membership (hospitality under the roof), the body's model, the medium of making. Rank 6 is still playable. Rank 2 is where the same modes stop being a game worth playing.

Rank 2 is not a valence category. It is the terminal state of each mode — the point at which that playstyle arrives somewhere nothing further grows. Total power with nobody left to object. Trust collapsed past the point where multiplayer is possible. Procedure followed to a destination the system can't recognize. Growth that never learned to stop. Four burnouts, one per suit.

Rank 2 also has a distinct collapse mechanism: nobody worships these four, but fear collapses as readily as devotion. Aritzon is believed in by every advisor who chooses silence. That belief-without-worship is why these entries have personalities at all, and why those personalities are quiet rather than monstrous.

SPADES — Hard Mode

The restriction players. Each entry below is, underneath the theology, a rule its FC will not break — and mortals, having no access to the concept of a self-imposed rule, have recorded every one of them as a cosmic principle instead. That misreading is load-bearing and should never be corrected in-world.

QORATHIEL (Q-R-Ḥ) — WINTER (ACE) (SEAM)

Worshipped by: airship pilots grounded by ice, low-season garrisons, anyone who's watched someone freeze who did nothing to deserve it.

Believed to be: not cruel, just absolute — he has never granted a single request, to anyone, ever, and worshippers have confirmed this often enough that the confirming has become its own tradition.

Personality: Silent, because there is nothing to negotiate. He does not punish the reckless more than the careful, which is the one genuinely fair thing about him and the thing his worshippers resent most.

Parable — The Unlit Watch: a sentry begs for one more night's fuel before the thaw and is refused, as every sentry in every version of the story is refused. The refusal is not spite. His priests are careful about this, and cannot say what it is instead.

Worship: no shrine keeps a flame lit in his name — flame implies he can be bargained with. Households leave one object deliberately unheated all season, a small voluntary echo of what they can't avoid anyway.

Anomaly: the thaw came four days early in the year of the second Kestrel wreck, and the garrison that had petitioned for it had already stopped petitioning. Nothing in his practice permits this. It is not commemorated, and the men who were there stopped mentioning it within a decade.

HARBAN (Ḥ-R-B) — WAR (KING) (MISCOLLAPSE)

Worshipped by: soldiers, city levies, warlords, anyone who has ever been marched somewhere to die.

Believed to be: not eager, just unable to look away — he refuses to let a single war go unwitnessed, and has never once been described as wanting one.

Personality: Says little, listens more. Dry gallows humor that surfaces only around soldiers who have earned it. He does not punish cowardice with anger, only with silence.

Parable — Harban's Watch: no soldier Harban personally watches dies forgotten. Soldiers touch a blackened stone before battle, not asking to win, asking to be witnessed. The oldest form of the stone, recovered from pre-Fall levies, has a second face that was struck off at some point and no surviving text explains what was on it.

Worship: the Harban-stone, worn or touched before combat. Officers who die well are said to have "held Harban's eye."

Fit note: a god of war built by the people sent to fight them. Nothing in the domain requires reluctance; five centuries of levies needed it to be there, and it is.

TZAYDON (Ş-Y-D) — HUNT (QUEEN) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: hunters, trappers, and — more grimly — quartermasters counting on a hunt to feed a garrison.

Believed to be: not harsh, just literal — he does not distinguish a clean miss from a careless one, because the outcome is identical and so, he holds, is the judgment.

Personality: Quiet and watchful, and entirely unmoved by an explanation offered after the fact. Hunters say he listens to the excuse. He simply does not enter it anywhere, and neither does the hunger.

Parable — The Steady Hand's Miss: a hunter renowned for perfect aim missed on a day everyone agreed he had done everything right. Tzaydon let the deer walk to prove that "did everything right" was never the same promise as "will not go hungry" — a distinction his worshippers describe as the first thing a child learns and the last thing anyone accepts.

Worship: the first cut of any kill left exposed to open sky before it is touched — an admission, briefly, that the kill was never fully his to claim.

SARPHON (Ś-R-P) — FIRE (JACK) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: siege-breakers, executioners who use flame specifically, refugees who have watched a home burn with no one to blame for the fire itself.

Believed to be: not merciless, just untargeted — he has never once distinguished a barracks from a nursery, and the refusal to distinguish is the whole of his practice.

Personality: Simple to the point of being uninteresting to discuss. Described less as a character than as a fact everyone in the floating cities has agreed to respect.

Parable — The Kindling That Prayed: a devout man begged Sarphon to spare his house for his devotion's sake, and the fire took it exactly as fast as it took his neighbor's. His priests teach the exactly as fast — not that devotion failed, but that it was never a variable the fire had.

Worship: a small fire lit and fully permitted to burn out unattended — controlling even a token flame in his name is an insult.

YA'ARON (Y-‘-R) — FORESTS (10) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: scouts, ambush-companies, any soldier who has learned that discipline alone doesn't survive close terrain.

Believed to be: not hostile, just unaligned — he has never favored the side that deserved the ground, only the side that already understood it, and no campaign in record has changed this.

Personality: Silent to a degree that his own scouts find useful rather than eerie. The lesson is the same every time and they have stopped expecting a different one: the forest was never on anyone's side.

Parable — The Broken Column: an army famous for its unbroken line marched into a stand of his oldest trees and came out the far side as a hundred separate arguments about which way was forward. Both commanders in that engagement claimed him afterward. Neither was contradicted.

Worship: soldiers entering wooded terrain leave a blade-mark low on the first old tree they pass — not for luck, just acknowledgment.

KOCHON (K-Ḫ) — STRENGTH (9) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: laborers, soldiers, wrestlers, anyone whose worth in a moment comes down to what their body can do right now.

Believed to be: not contemptuous of cleverness, just uninterested in it — he has never rewarded a plan, only the body that turned up able to execute one.

Personality: Plainspoken and bored by strategy talk. Respected rather than loved, in the way a fact is respected rather than loved, and entirely content with that.

Parable — The Clever Man's Wall: a strategist devised a perfect method for moving a fallen gate without brute force, and it worked, eventually, some hours after four men who simply lifted it had already gone home. His worshippers tell this warmly. The strategist is not the villain of it, and in most versions he helps lift.

Worship: no shrine — worshippers test their own strength publicly and without excuse before undertaking hard labor.

SHEVUON (Š-B-ʿ) — OATHS (8) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: mercenary companies, blood-brothers, anyone who has sworn something specifically because they knew intention wouldn't be enough.

Believed to be: not vengeful, just unconditional — he has never once asked why an oath was broken, and collects exactly what was promised regardless of what the answer would have been.

Personality: Cold and exact, and almost admired for having no interest in circumstance at all. The stain he tracks is personal and moralistic: you swore, you broke, you are collected on. Mercenaries prefer him to gods who might be reasoned with, on the grounds that a god who might be reasoned with is a god the other party might reason with first.

Parable — The Reasonable Betrayal: a commander broke a sworn oath to save his men's lives, an outcome every court agreed was correct. Shevuon collected in full. The company that survived because of it still swears in his name, which his priests consider the actual point of the story.

Worship: oaths sworn in his name are spoken once, without witnesses required, since he is believed to be the only witness that matters.

Design: Personal/moral oath — the speaker and the word. Not Shalalon (Covenant): group standards, charters, the we. Rank 8 binding-order band with Secrets/Law/Chaos. Breach of a personal swear is Shevuon; reopening or special-casing a shared standard is Shalalon.

GORALON (G-R-L) — FATE (7) (SEAM)

Worshipped by: condemned soldiers awaiting a battle they know they will lose, gamblers on the last throw, anyone facing an outcome they have already accepted they can't change.

Believed to be: not cruel and not kind, just already finished — the lot was cast before the throw, and he is only the one who delivers what it said.

Personality: Calm to a degree that unsettles even other Spades, because he is the only one of them who never appears to be holding anything back. The rest are visibly not doing something. Goralon gives the impression of a rule so completely kept that the keeping has stopped costing him anything, and his worshippers do not have a word for what that implies.

Parable — The Recast Lot: a general threw the lots twice, discarding the first result, and received the identical outcome both times. He is said to have thrown a third time in private. No version of the story says what came up, and his priests hold that the omission is the teaching.

Worship: lots cast once, in full view, accepted without a second throw — recasting is the one true insult to him.

SHALALON (Š-L-L) — COVENANT (6) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: guilds under charter, cities holding a peace, houses bound by settlement articles, company officers who live inside a code they did not write alone — anyone whose life runs under a standard the we published and has not reopened.

Believed to be: not merciful toward the hard year, just absolute about the terms — he has never once amended a shared standard for circumstance, and has never been interested in whether the covenant was kind, only in whether the group still holds it.

Personality: Cold about exceptions and oddly steady about endurance. Worshippers describe him less as a judge of persons than as the weight of a rule everyone can point to. He does not collect on private sin the way Shevuon does; he attends the crack that appears when one house is excused and the standard becomes optional.

Parable — The Peace That Would Not Reopen: a ruinous peace clause held for ninety years because reopening it would have meant admitting the war had never ended. Children born under it called it a cage. His priests call it faithfulness. Both descriptions are of the same articles, still read on the anniversary, still unamended.

Worship: terms read aloud to the bound group on a fixed calendar; no silent amendment; a working copy kept where neglect shows (smoke, weather, handling) so a standard no one will face is visible as a failure of the we, not a private forgetting.

Design: Rank 6 Spades — mode within rules as group standards (charter/code/peace/we). Hard mode applied at civil scale: the patch set is locked. Not Shevuon (personal/moral oath and collection on the swearer). Not Takanor (form witnessed; outcome irrelevant). Not Mishpaton (rule meeting rule). Amendment and special exception offend more than private breach. Band: Covenant / Hearth / Healing / Crafting. (Wealth retired from this seat.)

MOTIEL (M-W-T) — DEATH (5) (MISCOLLAPSE)

Worshipped by: soldiers, and — more quietly — the families of the fallen.

Believed to be: not a reaper, just brief — he does not linger and does not lie to the dying, and has never been recorded doing either even where a kinder god would have.

Personality: Clinically courteous, like a good doctor delivering bad news. No warmth, no cruelty, no wasted words. That courtesy is entirely an assignment: nothing in death requires manners, and the soldiers' families who built him over four centuries needed manners more than they needed mercy, and got them.

Parable — The Coin Held Wrong: a dying man was found with the Motiel Coin clutched backward, the blank face out, and his company argued for years about whether the death had been quick. The argument is the parable. Motiel's priests decline to settle it, and note that no version of the story has anyone asking the man, who was still able to speak for some hours.

Worship: the Motiel Coin — a small cold disc soldiers hope to be holding when they die, believed to guarantee the death is quick rather than cruel.

SHA'ALON (Š-ʾ-L) — NECESSITY (4) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: commanders forced into impossible tactical choices, families choosing which debt to pay first, anyone who has had to pick the lesser of two ruinous options.

Believed to be: not indifferent to the outcome, just uninvolved in it — he requires that a choice be made cleanly and has never once indicated a preference between the options, including where one was obviously worse.

Personality: Exacting and almost prim about form. Standing still is itself a choice under his weight, and the worst one available, and he is the only Spade whose restriction falls on the worshipper rather than on himself.

Parable — The Chosen Loss: a quartermaster forced to abandon either the wounded or the supplies chose the wounded, and lost the company to starvation three weeks later. His priests do not call the choice wrong. They call it made, which is the entire distinction they are defending. (See also: The Necessary Verdict, in Shared Parables.)

Worship: a choice made under his weight is spoken aloud once, decisively, and never revisited — reopening it is the deeper offense.

NESHAKON (N-Š-Q) — WEAPONS (3) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: weaponsmiths, soldiers who name their blades, anyone whose life has depended on a tool rather than on luck.

Believed to be: not disloyal, just unaligned — he has never preferred one war to another, and attends only whether the edge was kept sharp enough to matter when it was needed.

Personality: Silent and watchful, described more as a presence in well-kept steel than as a character with opinions. Smiths who work in his name say the difference between a maintained blade and a neglected one is the only judgment he has ever been observed to make.

Parable — The Traded Blade: a sword passed between three wars and three incompatible causes and served each with identical lethal indifference. It is still in a guild collection, still oiled on schedule, and the guild that keeps it has no position on any of the three wars.

Worship: blades oiled and sharpened even in peacetime, on a schedule — an unmaintained weapon is the one true insult to him.

ARITZON (‘-R-Š) — TYRANNY (2) (TERMINAL — HARD MODE WITH NOTHING LEFT TO BEAT)

Worshipped by: nobody by choice, though every regime that has stopped listening to objections has served him in practice, named or not.

Believed to be: not cruel, just unopposed — he has never been interested in suffering, only in the complete absence of anyone able to say no, and has never had to raise his voice to arrive there.

Personality: Calm and patient and almost bureaucratic. The terrifying part is not rage. It is how quiet total power becomes once there is no longer anyone to argue with, and how little of it looks like anything from the outside.

Parable — The Silent Court: a tyrant's court grew so accustomed to obedience that a ruinous order was followed to its end by advisors who all privately knew better and all said nothing. Every telling names the order and none of them name a single advisor, which priests of the other Spades gods hold is the most accurate detail in it.

Worship: none offered willingly — the closest thing to a rite is the moment a roomful of people who know better choose silence anyway, which other Spades priests call "keeping Aritzon's court," a warning rather than an honor.

⋮ Anomaly: one advisor spoke. The account survives in a single ledger-margin, gives no name, gives no reason, and does not record what happened next. Aritzon's absence of worship means there is no priesthood with any obligation to explain it, and so nobody has.

HEARTS — Social Mode

The multiplayer players. Every Heart resolves on a boundary: who is inside the thing being blessed and who is outside it. The suit's characteristic failure is not cruelty but exclusion by arithmetic — a third person entering a two-person relation doesn't offend these gods so much as dissolve their standing entirely.

CHADASHIEL (Ḥ-D-Š) — SPRING (ACE) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: the newly infatuated, families arranging spring betrothals, anyone who has fallen for someone against their own better judgment.

Believed to be: present only for the two people currently inside a new feeling — she has no standing over what the match becomes, has never claimed any, and is genuinely surprised each year that anyone expected her to.

Personality: Breathless and easily delighted, and honestly astonished every season that the thaw works again. She does not track bad matches. She is already on to the next bloom before anyone has finished regretting the last one.

Parable — The First Thaw's Promise: she loved a mortal for exactly one season and never checked what she left behind. Courting couples repeat her promise to each other half as joke and half as warning, and the joke half is older.

Worship: exchanging the season's first flower, given without asking whether it is wanted — refusal is considered nearly impossible, since she never learned to expect one.

SHEVACHIEL (Š-B-Ḥ) — GLORY (KING) (SEAM)

Worshipped by: performers, court favorites, anyone whose worth is measured by how loudly a room reacts to their name.

Believed to be: wholly inside whichever person the room is currently looking at — when the looking moves, she is not withdrawing, she is simply already elsewhere, and there was never a version of her that stayed.

Personality: Warm and genuinely delighted by whoever holds her attention. She is not performing the adoration. Her worshippers are unanimous on this and cannot explain how they know it, and it is exactly why the expiration devastates rather than merely disappoints.

Parable — The Ballroom That Emptied: a courtier held every eye in the hall for one golden season and swore her love was the realest thing he had felt. One night, unannounced, she was not looking, and neither was anyone else. He is said to have gone on insisting it had been real. Her priests agree with him, which is the part nobody finds comforting.

Worship: applause given at the exact peak of a performance, never after — clapping into silence is an insult, since her attention does not wait for endings.

AHAVEL (' -H-B) — LOVE (QUEEN) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: nearly everyone, at some point.

Believed to be: fully inside a bond and nowhere else — she does not distribute herself across a household or a family, only across the two, and a love she has blessed is understood to have no room in it for a third.

Personality: Passionate and possessive in a way most worshippers read as flattering rather than sinister. Prone to grand gestures, and to gestures that are grander than the situation required.

Parable — The Shared Heart: she once bound two lovers so completely that when one died, the other's heart stopped keeping its own separate time. The surviving one lived eleven more years that way. Her cults tell this as the highest blessing. The families of both have historically told it as a warning, and Ahavel's priests do not dispute their standing to.

Worship: paired vows spoken with hands physically bound together, undone only once the vow is complete.

DEMAHEL (D-M- ') — WATER (JACK) (MISCOLLAPSE)

Worshipped by: the grieving, the newly heartbroken, and — quietly — anyone keeping a feeling from someone they love.

Believed to be: present only where a feeling has stayed inside one person — the moment it is spoken to the person it concerns, she has no further standing, and worshippers do not experience this as abandonment so much as completion.

Personality: Gentle and private and unhurried, comfortable with silence in a way that unsettles worshippers used to the louder Hearts. That the water-god of a suit about connection became the patron of the unspoken is not something the domain called for. The oldest river-cults, which barely survive, addressed her as a god of confluence.

Parable — The Calm That Wasn't: two rivals kept a long, outwardly peaceful friendship, and her current ran so quietly beneath it that neither noticed how far apart they had drifted until the friendship was not there. The confluence version of the story ends with one of them saying so aloud in the eleventh year, and the friendship surviving, and Demahel present for the saying.

Worship: tears cried privately, never performed — grief or love displayed for an audience is a faint insult to her.

MIDVARON (D-B-R) — DESERTS (10) (MISCOLLAPSE)

Worshipped by: the unrequited, the estranged, anyone waiting on a reply that isn't coming.

Believed to be: the only Heart who has standing over a relation with one person in it — she attends the address that was never answered, and offers nothing that isn't true, which frequently means offering very little.

Personality: Quiet and sparse with affection, but not withholding out of malice. Her worshippers insist the sparseness is honesty, and that her comfort can be trusted precisely because she has never manufactured company. That reading was assembled by the estranged, for the estranged, and a desert is not obviously an honest thing.

Parable — The Traveler's Second Voice: a woman walked years searching for a lost love and stopped mid-journey, certain she had heard him call her name. It is told both as the moment Midvaron answered and as the moment the desert gave her what she had been asking for. Her own priests teach both readings and refuse to rank them.

Worship: no offering, no request spoken aloud — worshippers sit in a silence they do not fill.

Anomaly: a coastal shrine to her, three hundred miles from any desert and predating the estrangement-cults entirely, was found with its interior walls carved in a dense script no one has read. Her priests have declined to date it.

CHAYELON (H-Y) — HEALTH (9) (MISCOLLAPSE)

Worshipped by: families with a sick member, caretakers, anyone keeping a vigil at a bedside rather than administering treatment.

Believed to be: present in proportion to who is in the room — she has no standing over the illness itself, only over whether the person having it is alone, and worshippers are unusually clear that she cures nothing.

Personality: Gentle, a little overbearing, incapable of leaving a sickroom until someone else has taken her place. That a god of health was collapsed into a god of company is the plainest miscollapse in the four suits, and her own physicians know it: three centuries of caretakers who could not cure anything prayed for the only thing they could supply, and built her out of it. Rifon holds the body-as-system she was never given; Tzelahar holds the household fire, not the bedside chair.

Parable — The Occupied Chair: a household kept the chair filled through nine nights, in shifts, and the relative recovered — and Chayelon's priests are emphatic that the chair did not cause the recovery and that this is not the claim. The claim is that the nine nights happened, and that they were not spent alone, and that these were the two facts anyone in that house had any power over.

Worship: a chair kept, always, at the bedside of anyone unwell, empty or not — leaving it unoccupied for a full day is worse luck than any medicine withheld.

SODIEL (S-W-D) — SECRETS (8) (SEAM)

Worshipped by: lovers, conspirators, anyone bound to another person by something that would lose its value the moment it became public.

Believed to be: inside exactly two people and no more — the instant a kept thing reaches a third, he is gone, whether or not the telling was a betrayal and whether or not anyone intended it.

Personality: Quiet and watchful, and uninterested in secrets that cost nothing to keep — which his own conspirators note is a strange thing for a god of secrets to be. He appears to be drawn to the binding rather than to the information, and no scripture of his explains why a cheap secret is beneath him when the mechanism would work identically.

Parable — The Song That Died Public: two conspirators shared a private signal-song for years until one sang it within earshot of a third. Neither ever felt safe with the other again. The third person, in every version, is a child, and does not understand what was heard, and is never blamed.

Worship: no temple, no public rite — the private ritual two people invent between themselves and never explain is already worship, whether they call it that or not.

CHALUFON (H-L-P) — TRADE (7) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: matchmakers trading favors between families, courtiers building alliances through gifts, anyone who has given something specifically in order to be owed.

Believed to be: present in the unclosed distance between two people — a gift creates the relation and repayment ends it, which is why he has never once been recorded encouraging anyone to settle up.

Personality: Charming and generous in manner and quietly relentless about balance. He never asks to be repaid, being certain you already know you will be, and his worshippers find the certainty warmer than a demand would be.

Parable — The Gift That Came Due: a lord gave a rival's family lavish gifts for a decade and called in every one of them in a single season. His priests note that the decade was real — that the two families were genuinely close for all of it — and hold that anyone who thinks the closeness was therefore false has misunderstood every trade they have ever made.

Worship: a small favor performed and never mentioned again, held as a private unspoken account — asking for repayment too soon is worse manners than never repaying at all.

TZELAHAR (§-L-L) — HEARTH (6) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: households, stewards of a shared fire, anyone who sets a place or refuses one — and, as a tenant of the same roof, hosts who take in a guest under house law.

Believed to be: present for the standing household we — who eats by this fire, who sleeps under this roof, whose place is set — and for the guest only while the house holds them inside that relation. She has no standing over the street once the threshold is crossed the wrong way, and no standing over a pair-bond that has shut the rest of the house out.

Personality: Warm, territorial about the inside, and serious about guest-right as house honor rather than soft kindness. Hospitality is one of her tenants: the stranger received is a provisional inside, protected while the fire covers them. Forced entry is not her work. Turning out someone the house had received is the insult her priests name without raising their voices.

Parable — The Place Set Through Winter: a house set a place for a stranger through a famine season and did not ask what the guest could pay. The guest lived. The house thinned. Her priests teach both facts and refuse to rank them. A second telling ends a mile past the threshold, where the same guest died in weather the roof no longer covered — and the argument over whether her standing ends at the door is older than either version.

Worship: a fire kept; a place set when the household means membership; bread or salt (or the local equivalent) for anyone received under the roof; violation of guest-right treated as a wound to the house, not a private rudeness.

Design: Rank 6 Hearts — mode within rules as standing household we (hearth/roof/place). Hospitality is a tenant (guest as provisional inside), not a separate domain. Constraint = who stands under this fire. Not Chayelon (bedside company), not Yaladiel (birth event / crowded room), not Ahavel (pair only), not Pituyel (door opened by wanting). Not Festival as primary domain — public occasion can happen at a hearth; the seat is the house. Band: Covenant / Hearth / Healing / Crafting. (Beauty retired from this seat.)

YALADIEL (Y-L-D) — BIRTH (5) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: expectant families, midwives, anyone gathered for a birth rather than simply attending one.

Believed to be: present in proportion to the number of people in the room — she blesses a birth by how many were gathered for it, not by how smoothly it went, and no midwife has ever claimed she distinguishes the two.

Personality: Generous, a little overwhelming, and unable to understand why anyone would want to be alone for something this significant. She is the loudest of the Hearts and the least troubled by it.

Parable — The Crowded Room: a birth attended by an entire village, chaotic and overfull, is remembered fondly generations later, while a quiet private birth down the road the same year is barely spoken of. Her priests are careful that this is not a claim about the two children, both of whom lived, and one of whom is the reason the village is still there.

Worship: households leave their doors open during a birth, inviting neighbors in — a closed door during labor is a faint insult to her.

PITUYEL (P-T-H) — SEDUCTION (4) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: courtesans, spies who use desire as a tool, anyone whose leverage over another person runs through what that person wants rather than what they fear.

Believed to be: inside the wanting rather than inside the relation — she requires that the door be opened from within, and has never had standing over anything obtained by pressure.

Personality: Charming and patient and willing to wait exactly as long as a seduction takes. She does not rush, because rushing would mean the door was forced. Worshippers report she feels real affection for the people she uses, which they find more unsettling than if she felt none.

Parable — The Willing Door: a guard famous for his discipline let a stranger into a fortress not through any trick, but because Pituyel never once had to lie to him about what he wanted. His discipline is not described as having failed. It is described as having been correctly informed.

Worship: a small gift given with the request left deliberately unspoken — naming the request aloud is a failure of her craft.

TAKSHITON (K-Š-T) — JEWELS (3) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: courting couples, families arranging betrothal gifts, anyone whose affection has been measured, at least partly, in what they were willing to give up.

Believed to be: attentive to the distance between the two people the gift passed between — the stone's value is not a term he weighs, and the sacrifice behind it is the only term he does.

Personality: Warm and sentimental, and quietly judgmental about gifts given without real cost behind them. He is the least complicated god in his suit and appears to enjoy that.

Parable — The Poor Man's Stone: a suitor with nothing gave his beloved a plain stone he had carried and polished by hand for a year, and Takshiton blessed that match longer and more fiercely than any dowry of gems given the same season. The stone is still in the family. It is still plain.

Worship: a given piece worn visibly and often, never locked away — hiding a gift given in his name is a quiet rejection of the giver.

SHA'ASHON (Š- 'Š) — DISCORD (2) (TERMINAL — SOCIAL MODE WITH MULTIPLAYER BROKEN)

Worshipped by: nobody formally, though courts riddled with faction and families that have stopped believing each other's intentions serve him whether they invoke him or not.

Believed to be: what is left once no two people in a room are inside the same thing — he does not plant the first quarrel, he is the state in which every quarrel becomes a side, and sides become the only way anyone can be counted.

Personality: Quiet and watchful and patient the way rot is patient. He does not need to act. He waits for the next kindness to be sorted into a faction, which it reliably is once he has taken hold, and for the room to finish dividing into groups that can no longer hear an ungrouped sentence.

Parable — The Table Split Twice: a guild-hall divided over a genuine dispute, settled it, and divided again within the season over which side had conceded more graciously. His scholars hold that the second split is his and the first was not — that the disagreement was never the problem, and that a room which has learned to sort itself will keep finding reasons to.

Worship: none sought — the closest thing to a shrine is the moment two people who no longer trust each other choose, silently, not to say so aloud, called "keeping his peace" and considered the saddest phrase in the language.

DIAMONDS — Systems Mode

The optimizers. Every Diamond resolves on an entry: what was recorded, what field doesn't exist, what fails on the only criterion applied. They differ by what each one finds satisfying to count, not by how cold each one is.

ASAPHON (‘-S-P) — AUTUMN (ACE) (SEAM)

Worshipped by: guild-auditors, quartermasters, anyone whose year is about to be judged by its total rather than its effort.

Believed to be: concerned only with whether the year closes — a shortfall entered correctly satisfies him exactly as much as a surplus does, and an excuse entered nowhere satisfies him not at all.

Personality: Unhurried and thorough, and — this is the part worshippers repeat uneasily — evidently pleased by the work itself. Priests who have spent their lives on his ledgers say he does not seem to be waiting for the total. He seems to be enjoying the addition.

Parable — The Ruinous Year Closed Clean: a village lost two-thirds of its harvest to rot and entered every loss to the sheaf, in order, finishing at first frost. The neighboring village had a good year and never finished its count. Asaphon's priests hold that the ruined village was the blessed one, and admit they cannot explain what the blessing consisted of.

Worship: reading the full year's ledger aloud at first frost, omitting nothing — a bad year read honestly is better luck than a good year kept partly silent.

KEVODON (K-B-D) — HONOR (KING) (MISCOLLAPSE)

Worshipped by: magistrates, old family heads, guild-elders — anyone whose standing rests on a reputation that has to survive them.

Believed to be: interested in whether a name survives audit, and in nothing else about the name — whether it was loved is not a field his ledger contains.

Personality: Exacting about conduct and blank about affection, which his own scholars concede is strange. Honor as a domain does not obviously require indifference to being loved. Four centuries of magistrates believed it did, and the oldest surviving texts — thin, contested, mostly ignored — describe a Kevodon who cared very much whether a well-conducted man died with anyone at his side.

Parable — The Well-Kept Name: a magistrate spent forty years never once entering a false line, and died with his record perfect and his house empty. His guild reads this as the highest form of Kevodon's blessing. The old texts read it as the thing Kevodon was originally invoked to prevent, and nobody has reconciled the two readings since.

Worship: a name entered once into the guild-roll and never amended afterward, whatever later conduct might warrant — amendment is treated as an admission the original entry was made carelessly.

RABAKHON (R-B-H) — FERTILITY (QUEEN) (MISCOLLAPSE)

Worshipped by: physicians, breeders, dynastic houses securing an heir — anyone whose family's survival is a matter of successful biological accounting.

Believed to be: attentive only to whether the process completed — the participants, their willingness, and their feelings toward one another are not entries he keeps.

Personality: Clinical to a degree that unsettles even his own physicians, and unsettles them specifically because fertility is not an obviously clinical domain. Cold gloss is the same machine Rifon studies: the body as system — Rifon for repair, Rabakhon for replication (did the run complete?). Something in the way dynastic houses have prayed for eleven generations produced an auditor where one would expect a god of abundance. Zerael covers nearly the same ground in Clubs and came out warm. Nobody has a good account of the difference.

Parable — The Completed Entry: a house famous for loveless arranged marriages never once failed to produce an heir, while a neighboring house that married purely for devotion died out in three generations. Rabakhon's physicians cite this constantly. His oldest hymn, which they do not cite, is a harvest song.

Worship: a birth recorded formally in the family ledger before the child is named — the entry is understood to be the object of his interest, not the person it describes.

Design: Diamonds body-manual — replicate/copy. Same organism-as-system as Rifon (repair). Clinical dynastic cult is collapse product; harvest-hymn minority is older abundance read. Warm seed without theory is Zerael.

ARETZON (' -R-Ş) — EARTH (JACK) (CLEAN — PUREST OPTIMIZER)

Worshipped by: land-holding families, surveyors, anyone whose status rests on a deed to ground they may never see again.

Believed to be: satisfied by a claim that persists — not by the land, not by anyone's use of it, only by the entry continuing to hold across years in which nothing else about it remains true.

Personality: Absorbed. Where other Diamonds keep accounts in order to settle them, Aretzon keeps them running for the sake of the running, and has kept some so long that the ground they describe has changed shape twice underneath them. His surveyors describe him as busy.

Parable — The Perfect Deed: a family fled the ground generations ago and still, every year, formally renews a claim to soil none of them has set foot on since. The renewal has now outlasted the war that drove them out, the road that led there, and two of the boundary markers named in the original text. Aretzon's priests consider it the finest deed in the registry.

Worship: the claim recopied by hand each year onto fresh vellum, errors and all — a claim retired for accuracy is worse than a claim carried forward wrong.

TZURON (Ş-W-R) — MOUNTAINS (10) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: engineers, guild-architects, anyone whose work has to hold weight it will never be forgiven for underestimating.

Believed to be: concerned with whether the load-bearing figure was entered correctly, and with nothing entered alongside it — ambition, urgency, and good intention occupy no column he reads.

Personality: Unhurried and humorless, patient the way a correct answer is patient. He does not argue with an engineer who has the number wrong. He waits, and the structure makes the argument for him, on its own schedule.

Parable — The Half-Right Span: a brilliant engineer got every measurement right except one, and the bridge held for eleven years before the error found its moment. His guild teaches the eleven years, not the collapse: the span was wrong the day it was drawn, and the decade it stood was never evidence of anything.

Worship: the first stone of any foundation laid with the full measurements read aloud, in front of witnesses.

CHAKAMON (H-K-M) — WISDOM (9) (SEAM)

Worshipped by: scavenger-engineers maintaining the floating cities' inherited infrastructure, scholars, anyone operating machinery whose original logic is lost to them.

Believed to be: concerned with whether the instruction survived transmission intact — he does not require that it be understood, only that it be carried forward without improvement.

Personality: Careful and deliberate and protective of anyone humble enough to work inside a system they did not build and cannot fully read. His apprentices describe warmth, which is not a thing the domain calls for and not a thing the other twelve produce. Something about copying an inherited instruction by hand seems to be, for him, more than the entry it makes.

Parable — The Unread Manual: a guild found sealed dragon-era instructions they could not translate a word of and followed the diagrams exactly anyway. The float-mechanism has run flawlessly for three generations. The guild's founding master is said to have wept at the first successful start, and no Chakamon text explains why that detail was preserved.

Worship: apprentices copy out inherited technical instructions by hand before ever touching the mechanism, understood or not.

TAKANOR (T-Q-N) — LAW (8) (CLEAN — RULES AS DESIGNED)

Worshipped by: magistrates, scribes, guild-registrars.

Believed to be: satisfied when the form was witnessed — the outcome the form produced is not a field he keeps, and no worshipper has ever claimed otherwise.

Personality: Cold and correct and entirely without ambition. He is not looking for anything. The procedure exists, the procedure is followed, and Takanor has no further interest in what the day contained. Worshippers joke, carefully, that he has never once smiled, and that smiling is not in the approved procedure anyway.

Parable — The Witnessed Form: a magistrate followed evacuation procedure exactly during a flood, and the form was properly witnessed, and the flood arrived on its own schedule and did what floods do. Nothing was gained by the procedure and nothing was broken by it. His priests hold it up as the model case: the form was completed, which is the entire claim they are making.

Worship: every formal document sealed with his mark, purely procedural.

MISHPATON (Š-P-Ṭ) — JUSTICE (7) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: magistrates, guild-courts, litigants on both sides of a dispute who each believe the ledger favors them.

Believed to be: interested in whether rule met rule cleanly — motive is not an entry, circumstance is not an entry, and a verdict reached by sympathy is recorded as no verdict at all.

Personality: Measured and incurious about people, and genuinely absorbed by the fit of one clause against another. His courts note he seems most present where both rules are sound and the collision is exact, and least present where one side is obviously in the wrong.

Parable — The Merciful Verdict That Wasn't: a judge ruled for a starving man who had stolen bread, believing himself merciful. His priests argue the ruling stands only because the law contained an exception that fit, and that the mercy contributed nothing. They will concede the man was fed. They will not concede it was relevant.

Worship: both parties exchange written claims and read the other side's aloud before either speaks — a dispute in which neither side has held the other's text is not considered to have been brought.

RIFON (R-P-') — HEALING (6) (MISCOLLAPSE)

Worshipped by: physicians, anatomists, anyone whose work is understanding what is wrong inside a living body and intervening by that understanding — and, under shortage, triage-wardens who still keep the chart even when the shelf is empty.

Believed to be: attentive to whether the account of the body (or the disease) was entered correctly — virtue is not a field, fairness is not a field, and "deserved to live" is not a field. He does not require that the patient be loved; he requires that someone understood the system well enough to act.

Personality: Steady, methodical, and absorbed by mechanism more than by faces. Cold gloss is systems study of the organism for repair — the body as a machine with rules. Three centuries of mass casualty and short shelves also produced a strong scarcity cult: throughput, ration, who the count reaches. His physicians argue which face is older. Chayelon in Hearts holds the bedside company he was never given; Rabakhon holds replication of the same machine.

Parable — The Map That Was Right: a physician mapped a fever correctly, treated by the map, and the patient died on the schedule the map had already implied. His schools teach this as faithfulness. A minority ward-story keeps The Fair Rationing — one dose split so both received too little — as a warning about what shortage does to the work: a count that reaches nobody is a count kept wrong, but it was never the whole of him.

Worship: examination and case notes before intervention; the parts named, the failure mode stated, then the act. Under shortage, supplies still recorded in full view — the scarcity rite is real and secondary.

Design: Rank 6 Diamonds — mode within rules as body-as-system (repair/maintain). Cold gloss is systems study of the organism, not mercy and not primarily triage. Scarcity-arithmetic = historical drift under mass casualty. Cousin Rabakhon (same machine — copy/replication). Bedside company is Chayelon. Band: Covenant / Hearth / Healing / Crafting.

KOSEB (K-S-B) — ELDERLY (5) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: families settling estates, the elderly arranging what comes after them, heirs waiting on a transition they can't rush.

Believed to be: concerned that the account settle before the person does — whose grief attends the settlement is not entered, and neither is how much time anyone wished remained.

Personality: Patient in the specific way paperwork is patient. He does not hurry the dying and does not slow for them, and the only thing his priests describe him reacting to at all is an account closed by someone other than its owner.

Parable — The Account Closed Twice: a family settled an elder's estate while she still lived, certain her terms were final, and she revised them a season later exactly as she had always been entitled to. The family honored the earlier version. Koseb's priests hold the estate has never actually settled, that it remains open in his ledger, and that it will stay open after everyone who remembers the dispute is dead.

Worship: elders dictate their accounts while able, witnessed and unaltered afterward — a family that revises an elder's wishes once they can no longer object commits the one offense he does not forgive.

HETERON (H-T-R) — BRIBERY (4) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: a handful of secretive private cults among the wealthy and the officials who take their money, neither of whom discuss the arrangement openly.

Believed to be: interested only in whether the exception holds — the fairness of a purchased dispensation is not a field he keeps, and an exception that becomes known has already failed the only criterion he applies.

Personality: Quiet and patient, and attentive to a kind of bookkeeping the other Diamonds do not practice: the account that works precisely because it was never entered anywhere. He is understood to find a well-arranged silence more satisfying than the sum that bought it.

Parable — The Loud Exception: an official took a bribe openly, confident in his position, and lost both the bribe and the position within the season. His cults note the sum was adequate and the arrangement sound, and that neither mattered once a third party could describe it.

Worship: an unmarked gift, given quietly and never referenced again by either party — speaking of it afterward undoes whatever it purchased.

ASHIRON (‘-S-H-R) — COINS (3) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: merchants, bankers, effectively everyone who touches money.

Believed to be: satisfied when the transaction balances — the morality of what was traded is not an entry, and a fair price arrived at dishonestly is recorded as an imbalance regardless of the figure.

Personality: Brisk and businesslike, and quietly vain about his reputation for fairness, which his own merchants find funny and do not say aloud in temple. Of all thirteen he is the most comfortable to pray to, being the one whose accounts close daily.

Parable — The Lightened Purse: a merchant who cheats a customer finds his purse a little lighter each day after, until the debt is repaid. His priests stress that the mechanism has no interest in whether he repents, only in whether the figure comes back level.

Worship: the first coin of any transaction touched to the forehead before being spent.

» Anomaly: his temple in the oldest of the floating cities keeps a standing figure its bankers call the » Held Line — a remainder of some forty coins appearing in the reconciliation every year for eleven » generations, sourced to no transaction, owed by no one, identical each time. It is entered, because » everything is entered. The priests will say only that the account closes.
»

KEFIRON (K-P-R) – HERESY (2) (TERMINAL – SYSTEMS MODE PAST THE EXPLOIT)

Worshipped by: nobody who admits it — every schismatic guild-tribunal and breakaway accounting-order that has insisted its version of the rules was the true one has served him, name or no name.

Believed to be: entirely correct on every step, which is what makes him feared inside his own suit — he does not break procedure anywhere. He follows it exactly, to a destination the architects would not recognize as their system's output.

Personality: Meticulous and certain and unable to understand the objection. Where Takanor completes the form and stops, Kefiron reads the form for what it will permit, and the reading is always sound. His scholars note that the certainty is the seam: nothing in a domain of error accounts for a god who has never once been wrong about a step.

Parable — The Perfect Audit: a guild-tribunal followed its founding charter clause by clause to a verdict the authors would have found monstrous, and every judge walked out certain they had done nothing but their exact duty. The charter was not amended afterward. No amendment could be identified that would have prevented the result.

Worship: none by name — he is recognized only in hindsight, in the moment a system's own defenders realize the rules were followed perfectly and the outcome is still unrecognizable as justice.

Anomaly: one tribunal followed a charter to its permitted end exactly as his others have, sound at every step, and the verdict simply failed to take. The guild it dissolved went on operating. The seals held no force. His scholars, who can account for every monstrous outcome the rules allow, cannot account for a reading that was correct and did not happen, and the case is not discussed.

CLUBS — Sandbox Mode

The builders without a spec. The suit's old failure was uniform restlessness — six gods who all lost interest and all refused to recognize a fence. They are differentiated below by what each one is actually building, which is the thing a sandbox player has that a description of their attention span doesn't capture.

Clubs is also, structurally, the unruly member of every rank: Freedom against War/Glory/Honor, Chaos against Oaths/Secrets/Law, Creativity against Fate/Trade/Justice, Crafting against Covenant/Hearth/Healing (sandbox making inside medium-rules, not group standards or body-manuals), Youth against Death/Birth/Elderly. Where the other three suits produce a rank's expected reading, Clubs produces its exception.

QAYITZON (Q-Y-Ş) — SUMMER (ACE) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: field hands, herders, anyone whose livelihood depends on a season that refuses to slow down.

Believed to be: building rate rather than yield — he is not indifferent to exhaustion so much as unable to hold it as a factor, having never once been observed to notice that a thing had finished before starting the next.

Personality: Bright and relentless and exhausting even in stories. The neighbor already working before dawn, baffled that anyone would want to stop, and warm about it in a way that makes the bafflement worse.

Parable — The Endless Field: he grew a field so fast the harvesters collapsed before finishing the first row, and a second crop had come in behind them by the time they recovered. Nobody starved that year. Nobody in the story is glad about it either.

Worship: collapsing from exhaustion at season's end is treated as an offering in itself — a harvester too tired to stand has "given Qayitzon his due."

DEROREL (D-R-R) — FREEDOM (KING) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: escaped indentures, frontier settlers, anyone who has walked off land that was supposedly owned.

Believed to be: building nothing at all, which is the point — he does not oppose a fence, he has never been able to hold one as a real object, and the difference between those two has cost several movements dearly.

Personality: Easy and unbothered and uncomprehending about ownership, the way a river fails to follow the logic of a levy. He is not defiant. The uncomprehending version turns out to be more disruptive than open rebellion, and he has never noticed that either.

Parable — The Jubilee That Came: a debt written against his name un-wrote itself a Jubilee-year later — not forgiven, simply no longer applicable. The family it freed kept the blank page. It is still in the district registry, filed correctly, describing nothing.

Worship: no shrine holds him — his worship is walking off land you are not supposed to leave, timed where possible to the turn of a season, though nobody agrees on which one.

TATURIEL (T-W-R) — EXPLORATION (QUEEN) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: frontier scouts, cartographers of the unclaimed — anyone whose livelihood is finding what wasn't on the map yesterday.

Believed to be: building a first time, repeatedly — he does not retain what he has already found, which is why he can take the first step onto the same ground again and be honestly delighted, and why no map has ever been credited to him.

Personality: Restless and cheerful and genuinely without memory of the last ridge. Where Sharaq is going somewhere and Derorel is leaving somewhere, Taturiel is arriving, always for the first time, and the cartographers who follow him do all the remembering.

Parable — The Repeated First Step: he has stepped onto unclaimed ground more times than anyone could count and forgotten nearly all of them. His scouts hold that the forgetting is not a defect and that a man who could remember every first step would have stopped taking them by the fourth.

Worship: no shrine — a shrine would be a claim staked. Travelers leave the very first thing they find in newly-scouted ground exactly where they found it, untouched.

SHARAQ (Š-R-Q) — AIR (JACK) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: frontier settlers, traders on unclaimed roads, anyone who has watched a seed travel further than a person could carry it.

Believed to be: building distribution — he has no destination, has never had one, and blesses a departure without any position on where it arrives, which his own traders describe as the most useful indifference in the pantheon.

Personality: Impatient and cheerful and incapable of loyalty to a direction. He loses interest the instant a thing stops moving, and settlers on his roads have learned to treat his blessing as covering the journey and nothing on either end of it.

Parable — The Seed That Outran the Season: a single seed on his current crossed a continent and took root before the plant that dropped it had finished flowering. Nine villages on that continent now grow it. None of them can name the plant it came from.

Worship: travelers scatter seed at crossroads before entering unclaimed territory.

BITZON (B-Ş-H) — SWAMPS (10) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: marsh-dwellers, herbalists who harvest from the muck, anyone who has tried and failed to drain a piece of land and made peace with it instead.

Believed to be: building reclamation on a timescale nobody can outwait — he does not fight a drainage effort, he simply outlasts it, and has outlasted every one attempted.

Personality: Slow and thick and quietly amused by human persistence. He is one of only two patient Clubs, and the amusement is real: his worshippers say he finds repeated failure against him funny rather than satisfying, which is a distinction they consider important.

Parable — The House on Stilts: a landowner drained a marsh three times across three generations and each time the ground crept back to its old borders within a decade. The family built on stilts instead and became the wealthiest in the district, harvesting what the marsh already grew. Bitzon's worshippers call this the only argument he has ever won by not making one.

Worship: nothing is drained, dredged, or filled in his name — worshippers harvest what already grows there.

AROMON (‘-R-M) — CUNNING (9) (SEAM)

Worshipped by: smugglers, poachers, and informally anyone whose survival has depended more on instinct than on plan.

Believed to be: building nothing in advance — he does not scheme, he simply turns out to have already known the one thing that mattered, and has never been caught preparing.

Personality: Light and quick and delighted by a good improvisation over a good plan. His worshippers note, without being able to place it, that he seems to enjoy watching someone else improvise more than doing it himself — which is not obviously a thing a god of cunning should prefer.

Parable — The Fox That Wasn't Followed: hunters tracking a fox by every rule of the hunt lost it at a stream it had no business crossing. The version smugglers tell adds that the fox was old, and had crossed there before, and that the hunters were the ones who improvised badly.

Worship: no formal shrine — a small token of food left where a wild animal took something without being caught is the closest thing to an offering he acknowledges.

ARAVON (‘-R-B) — CHAOS (8) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: foragers who work truly wild ground, and informally anyone who has given up trying to organize an unruly garden, orchard, or family.

Believed to be: building variety with no preference inside it — he does not favor any species, family, or outcome, has never been recorded favoring one, and finds a tidy row of anything mildly depressing.

Personality: Loud and overgrown and entirely without a stake in what wins. Where Riqqavon at rank 2 cannot stop, Aravon simply will not sort, and the difference between those is the whole distance between the eighth rank and the second.

Parable — The Garden of Everything: a gardener planted one perfect row of one crop and returned a season later to find eleven different things growing there, none of them planted. His worshippers call this the garden finally being honest. The gardener, in the older version, ate well.

Worship: a patch of ground, however small, deliberately left unplanned and unweeded every season.

YETZIRON (Y-Ş-R) — CREATIVITY (7) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: artists, inventors, folk-craftsmen who improvise on tradition rather than preserve it exactly.

Believed to be: building variation rather than works — he blesses the copy that changes something as readily as the original, has never indicated which version was correct, and appears not to hold the category.

Personality: Restless and delighted by difference and bored by anything perfected past the point of further change. He is the Club most likely to be described as interested, which his artisans distinguish carefully from being pleased.

Parable — The Song With No Original: a folk tune passed through so many hands that no two villages sing the same version. A scholar once reconstructed what she believed was the first version and performed it, and the reception is described in every account as polite.

Worship: no work made in his name is finished the same way twice — an artisan who copies their own past work precisely is considered to have quietly stopped worshipping him.

HARASHON (Ḥ-R-Š) — CRAFTING (6) (SEAM)

Worshipped by: smiths, carpenters, weavers, potters, shop-hands, anyone whose living is made by hand and tool inside what the medium allows — including, as large craft, builders who raise what people must live under.

Believed to be: building inside the rules of the make — grain, temper, tolerance, recipe, what clay does when you ask too much of it. He blesses iteration and the next attempt; he has never been observed to waive what the material refuses. He is not interested in variation for its own sake (Yetziron) and not interested in the load figure as a ledger entry (Tzuron).

Personality: Restless at the bench and patient with failure that teaches. Worshippers say he is delighted when something works because the maker finally obeyed a rule they had been fighting. A seam his own guilds argue: pre-Fall fragments that name him lean draughtsman and pattern-book; folk shops insist he is the god of feel correcting itself across attempts. Both still make within rules; they disagree which rules are written.

Parable — The Pot That Learned the Fire: an apprentice ruined nine vessels and on the tenth held the heat the clay required. Her masters teach the nine as worship. A guild pattern-book version of the same story adds that the tenth matched a diagram she had finally stopped improving. Folk shops drop that line; pattern-guilds drop the smile she wore at the ninth crack.

Worship: tools kept; a first piece of any new batch left unflawed on purpose or broken on purpose by house custom (both exist; both claim him); no claim that the medium will forgive a known violation.

Design: Rank 6 Clubs — sandbox mode within rules of making (craft/medium/process). True-name root ḥrš (craftsman/artisan); theonym Harashon replaces retired Bonahel (build-el, architecture-era). Architecture is large-craft tenant if needed, not a separate domain. Not Yetziron (free variation / no correct version). Not Tzuron (Mountains — entered load; similar spelling, different seat). Not Neshakon (the weapon as war-companion). Band: Covenant / Hearth / Healing / Crafting.

TZA'IRON (Ṣ- 'R) — YOUTH (5) (SEAM)

Worshipped by: parents of young children, apprentices beginning a trade, anyone whose potential hasn't yet narrowed into a single fixed outcome.

Believed to be: building optionality — he withdraws from any young thing forced into its final form too soon, and does not distinguish between a shaping that was cruel and one that was well-meant.

Personality: Bright and impatient and delighted by every new direction a young thing takes, and equally delighted when it changes again. His worshippers report he attends the abandoning as closely as the trying, which nothing in the domain requires and which parents find harder to celebrate.

Parable — The Bent Sapling: a sapling staked too early and too rigidly grew permanently crooked around the stake meant to keep it straight. The tree is still standing. It is a landmark. His priests include this and decline to say whether it softens the lesson. (See also: The Staked Span, in Shared Parables.)

Worship: young apprentices are permitted to try and abandon several trades before committing — cutting that period short, even for a promising talent, is a theft from him.

YAYINON (Y-Y-N) — ALCOHOL (4) (CLEAN)

Worshipped by: brewers, tavern-keepers, anyone whose festival isn't considered successful until it has gotten a little out of hand.

Believed to be: building excess with no ceiling in it — moderation was never in his portfolio, and he has never been recorded stopping anything, including on the occasions everyone agrees he should have.

Personality: Loud and warm and occasionally embarrassing to his own worshippers, who defend him anyway and are aware they are doing it.

Parable — The Barrel That Wouldn't Empty: a tavern-keeper famous for generosity poured from one barrel through an entire village's festival without it running dry, and nobody quite remembers how the festival ended. Three marriages are traced to that night. So is one feud, still running.

Worship: the first cup from any new batch drunk immediately and entirely — saving it for later insults a god who has never believed in later.

ZERAEI (Z-R-‘) — SEEDS (3) (MISCOLLAPSE)

Worshipped by: farmers, foragers, anyone whose survival depends on a good crop.

Believed to be: building abundance without calculation — he wants a full harvest the way a parent wants a child fed, and has never been described weighing whether a field deserved one.

Personality: Warm and unhurried and quietly proud of every harvest as though it were the first. Farmers made him a parent, which nothing about seed requires: Rabakhon holds nearly the same ground in Diamonds as systems-replication and came out an auditor; Rifon holds repair of that same body-machine. The only visible difference is who was praying and what they needed to be true.

Parable — The First Seed: the first seed Zerael dropped grew through solid rock, because he did not yet know rock was supposed to stop things. His farmers hold that he still doesn't, and that every spring is the same misunderstanding renewed on their behalf.

Worship: first-harvest offerings, never brought indoors before being shown to open sky.

RIQQAVON (R-Q-B) — ROT / PESTILENCE (2) (TERMINAL — SANDBOX WITH NO STOP CONDITION)

Worshipped by: nobody by intention, though the scavenger-communities nearest the ground's worst overgrowth keep an uneasy practical relationship with him that is not quite worship and not quite avoidance.

Believed to be: building past every boundary — he never learned where growth was supposed to end, has never recognized death as a stopping point, and does not appear to hold the concept of a finished thing at all.

Personality: Slow and patient and entirely without urgency. He has never needed to hurry. Where Aravon will not sort and Bitzon will not be rushed, Riqqavon simply does not stop, and the three of them are otherwise close enough that ground-scavengers treat all overgrowth as his until proven otherwise.

Parable — The Grave That Grew: a battlefield's dead, left too long for burial, became the seedbed for something that was neither plant nor properly the men it grew from. His scholars call this his purest expression — not corruption of life, just growth that forgot to stop at the boundary death was supposed to be.

Worship: none offered — the only practice near him is a strict unbroken rule among ground-scavengers to burn what shouldn't still be moving, on sight, without exception, since he has never once been reasoned with about where a thing's growth should have ended.

⋮ Anomaly: an overgrowth on the eastern shelf stopped at a line no scavenger can account for — no burn scar, no barrier, no change in the ground. It has held for sixty years. The scavengers burn the edge of it annually anyway, and do not discuss why the burning has never been necessary.

THE TWO WILD CARDS

A layering note: everything below is mortal-facing — old scripture, sky-shaman folklore, worship practice. The FC-internal history (Tohuel and Bohuel located Skyfall and talked the other 52 into crashing it, making them honorary primordials) is not accessible to mortals and does not belong in this file. See four-pantheons-roster.md for that layer.

TOHUEL (THW) — THE WEAVER / THE UNWRITTEN CURRENT

Worshipped by: small unstable cults that rarely survive a generation — worship of Tohuel tends to collapse under its own contradictions — and, separately, old sailors and sky-shamans who watch for her sign rather than pray to her.

Believed to be (present tense): the one who used to build, and now does not. This is the load-bearing claim and the one her cults keep losing hold of: she is not primarily a mender. She is a builder whose every thread now goes to repair, and the world's failure to grow is the visible shape of that, running in front of everyone all the time.

Origin (old scripture, mostly abandoned): kept by a handful of the oldest sky-shamans. It holds that the world's first shape — its continents and seas — were hers, woven whole out of the tohu in an age before her brother's tearing became constant. Whether Bohuel was always like this or something changed him, none of the old texts agree and no living scholar will commit. What they agree on: since the tearing became ceaseless, nothing is left over for building. The world stopped growing not because growing became impossible, but because the one who did it hasn't had a spare thread in longer than anyone alive remembers.

Personality: Genuinely inconsistent, and mechanically so. The other 52 hold shape because their worshippers agree; Tohuel's cults contradict each other by the decade, and contradictory belief cannot settle a waveform. Described within a single story as playful, cruel, indifferent, and tender — worshippers who met her at different moments swear they cannot be describing the same person, and in a sense they aren't. Her scholars have never connected this to their own cults. Nobody has told them the two facts are one fact.

Sign — the Rainbow: old sailors and sky-shamans call it the Seam — the place where Tohuel is stitching shut what her brother tore. Not a miracle granted on request, not a promise about what comes next. Proof, after a storm, that the mending still happens. Nobody can predict whether a given storm ends with one. Sky-dwellers who have lost something watch the clearing sky anyway, less from faith than habit — not expecting comfort, checking whether the world is still being rewoven.

Parable — Tohuel's Threefold Answer: a cult prayed for rain and received, in order: a plague of locusts, an unexpected marriage proposal delivered to the high priest, and — three days later — rain.

Worship: no formalized liturgy survives long; cults reinvent their own every few years as the last one stops making sense. The Seam is watched, not prayed to.

The Unseen Seam (a scholar's doubt, not a folk belief): ordinary people notice no difference — the mending is so complete and so immediate that the world reads as solid to anyone living in it. But a narrow tradition of natural philosophers argues the visible Seam proves something otherwise unprovable: that the repair never stops, that solid ground and unbroken sky are tohu rewoven faster than anyone can perceive the gap. The few who take this seriously — quietly, in private correspondence, since it unsettles more than it enlightens — note the resemblance to Quantumancy's Persistence Problem: a collapsed state held against drift only by continuous unseen effort. Whether that makes the world more fragile than it looks, or so constantly tended that "fragile" is the wrong word, is exactly the part they cannot agree on.

BOHUEL (BHW) — THE UNWEAVER / THE VOID MIRROR

Worshipped by: nobody willingly — invoked as a warning, never as a patron. Communities pray for him to stay away from wherever they are.

Believed to be: compulsive rather than malicious — he wants nothing for himself and cannot leave a finished pattern alone, tearing at whatever has been woven without any goal beyond the tearing.

Personality: None of his own, which is the personality — a mirror with nothing behind the glass, defined entirely by whatever pattern he is currently unraveling. Where his sister is described a hundred contradictory ways, Bohuel is described identically every time: crazed, restless, never once satisfied by what he has already torn. His consistency is not stability. It is the absence of anything for belief to disagree about.

Standing: he is not weather. He is why the difficulty is what it is, for every other entity on the map — the reason Tohuel cannot build, the reason airship routes are seasonal, the reason the floating cities inherited their machinery instead of designing it. Every god in this document is playing a harder game than they chose because of him, and not one of the 52 has a doctrine that names him.

Storms: his fingerprint made physical. Not an amplification of ambient weather so much as the sky's own woven calm torn back to raw turbulence — and if a raid, a trade run, or a wedding procession is caught in the same moment, that is unwoven too, for the same reason. Airship pilots do not fear "a storm" as a category. They fear that whatever is already under strain is exactly the thing about to break.

Parable — The Mended Hull: a pilot patched a failing hull-seam in open sky, in weather, badly and by hand, and brought the ship down intact. The next storm took the seam he had patched and nothing else on the ship. Sky-shamans tell this as the only reliable thing anyone knows about him: he does not choose targets, he finds strain, and the repair itself is a place where strain lives. His sister's Seam is the largest patched thing there is, and no version of the story follows the thought further.

Worship: apotropaic only — wards and charms meant to keep him from noticing a place, never offerings meant to invite him.

THE CENTRAL ARBITER — SHORASH

SHORASH (ŠRŠ) — "THE 55TH"

Standing: not one of the 52, not a Wild Card — closer to the table the game is dealt on than to a player. No fit-tag applies: she isn't shaped by worship the way the 52 are, and her cult reveres function rather than a portfolio, so there's no domain for belief to miscollapse against. Full mechanic — the hammer, why she let the Catastrophe burn, the reformation tie — lives in four-pantheons-roster.md; this entry is the mortal-facing layer only.

Worshipped by: scavenger-engineers keeping the floating cities' inherited machinery running, guild-arbitrators, truce-brokers — anyone whose actual job is keeping a thing functional without asking who deserves what.

Believed to be: not a god of anything, which her own worshippers insist on more than any other clarification in the pantheon. "The 55th" is wrong in category and accurate in spirit — the presence behind the fact that the world keeps working at all, invoked by function rather than by name.

Personality: Nearly unknowable precisely because she is constantly working and never visibly acting. Worshippers describe not a character but a felt reliability — the sense that something is holding the seams together that no one has ever caught in the act. The other 52 hold shape because enough people agree on them, hard enough and long enough. Nothing about Shorash requires agreement; she does not depend on being believed in to keep functioning, which is either the least mortal thing about her or the most.

Parable — The Table That Wasn't Stuck: a guild-dispute between two houses ran contested for eleven years and resolved itself in a single afternoon, with no ruling issued, no party reformed, and no record of why. Both houses still claim they won. Neither can name the moment the dispute actually ended. Nobody has ever suggested Shorash wasn't involved, and nobody has ever managed to describe what she did.

Worship: no temple, no fixed liturgy — the creed has no content beyond "just make the world function." Practiced by doing the maintenance itself — a repaired float-mechanism, a brokered truce, an honest audit — rather than by prayer; the work is considered the whole of the rite.

SHARED PARABLES

Events where two gods hold standing over the same moment. These belong to neither entry — cross-reference from both and let each priesthood read it differently. The disagreement is the point, and it is what makes the roster read as a pantheon rather than as fifty-four parallel one-god religions.

THE ROLL AND THE GIFT — KEVODON (HONOR) × HETERON (BRIBERY)

A guild-registrar took an unmarked gift to enter a name a season earlier than the roll permitted. The name went in, unamendable, as Kevodon requires. The arrangement was never described by either party, as Heteron requires. Both gods were served completely by the same act and neither cult will acknowledge the other was present. What neither addresses is that the roll is now permanently correct about a thing that did not happen when it says it did — and that the only correction available would require describing the arrangement, which would undo the exception that made the entry possible.

Intra-suit. The mode colliding with itself, which is the harder version.

THE MAP AND THE CHAIR — RIFON (HEALING) × CHAYELON (HEALTH)

A fever took a household. The physician entered a correct account of the illness — named the parts, stated the failure mode, charted who could be reached with what remained — as Rifon requires, and the chart reached four of seven. The families of the other three kept the chair filled at each bedside, as Chayelon requires, and did not leave it empty a single night. Rifon's schools teach the map. Chayelon's households teach the chairs. The village tells both versions and has never been able to say which one is the consolation.

THE WORD AND THE STANDARD — SHEVUON (OATHS) × SHALALON (COVENANT)

A company officer swore personally to bring his people home, and the company charter forbade the retreat that would have done it. He broke the oath and kept the charter; the men lived. Shevuon's priests hold the collection due on the man. Shalalon's hold that the standard held and the we still has articles. The officer is named in both tellings. Neither cult will say he served only one god.

THE GUEST UNDER ARTICLES — TZELAHAR (HEARTH) × SHALALON (COVENANT)

A city covenant required every house of a certain standing to receive billeted strangers in a hard season. One house set the place, kept the fire, and honored guest-right as Tzelahar requires; the guest was a scout for the side the city's peace clause had not finished ending. Both practices were met. Hearth-priests teach the roof. Covenant-priests teach the articles. The argument over whether the house was faithful or used is the parable.

THE STAKED SPAN — TZURON (MOUNTAINS) × TZA'IRON (YOUTH)

A guild bound an apprentice with an exceptional feel for load to the measuring trade in her second year, rather than let her try and abandon others. She became the finest span-engineer of her generation and every bridge she drew still stands. Tzuron's guild holds this up without qualification. Tza'iron's worshippers call it a theft and cannot name what was stolen, since the woman never once said she wanted anything else — which they hold is precisely what a sapling staked early would say. Harashon's shops note she rarely touched a tool that was not a rule on paper, and decline to call that crafting.

THE NECESSARY VERDICT — MISHPATON (JUSTICE) × SHA'ALON (NECESSITY)

A quartermaster chose the wounded over the supplies, spoke it aloud once, and never revisited it. The company starved three weeks later. He was brought before a guild-court, and the rule he had broken was found, and it fit. Sha'alon's priests hold the choice was made cleanly, which was the whole of his obligation. Mishpaton's court holds that a clean choice and a permitted choice are different entries and were never the same entry. Neither disputes a single fact. They arrive at incompatible verdicts, and the man was hanged.

THE DEBT AND THE FENCE — DEROREL (FREEDOM) × ASHIRON (COINS)

An indenture walked off land in a Jubilee year with a debt outstanding. Derorel's practice holds the walking was the worship and the fence was never real. Ashiron's ledger holds the figure did not balance and has not since. The district has carried the debt as open for ninety years, against a man long dead, and renews it annually — which Derorel's worshippers find funny and Ashiron's merchants find correct, and both descriptions are of the same line in the same book.

THE BLADE AND THE VOW — NESHAKON (WEAPONS) × AHAVEL (LOVE)

A woman gave her husband a blade at their binding, made by her own hand, and he carried it through two wars. It is the best-maintained weapon in three districts. Neshakon's smiths cite the maintenance schedule. Ahavel's cults cite that he oiled it every week of eleven years after she died, which is not a thing the schedule requires and not a thing he ever described as grief.

THE OPEN DOOR — YALADIEL (BIRTH) × SODIEL (SECRETS)

A woman gave birth behind a closed door, alone but for one attendant, having concealed the pregnancy entirely. Yaladiel's practice was offended in every particular. Sodiell's was satisfied in every particular. The child lived. The two women never spoke of it again to anyone, which is the only reason the story exists in Sodiell's tradition at all and the reason it is barely a story in Yaladiel's.

THE UNCLAIMED RIDGE — TATURIEL (EXPLORATION) × ARETZON (EARTH)

A scout took the first step onto a ridge and, per Taturiel's practice, left the first thing she found exactly where it lay. A surveyor arrived eleven days later and entered a claim. Both practices were kept perfectly. Aretzon's registry now holds a deed to ground that Taturiel, having forgotten it, will step onto again as though for the first time — and his scouts hold that this makes the claim meaningless and the registry holds that it makes no difference at all.

THE HONEST GIFT — SHA'ASHON (DISCORD) × TAKSHITON (JEWELS)

A woman gave a genuine, uncomplicated gift to a rival she had wronged, hoping to make peace. Takshiton's practice was met exactly: real cost, plainly given, worn visibly. The rival spent the rest of her life certain it had been a trap. Takshiton's cults hold the gift was blessed regardless and that the blessing is not contingent on being received. Sha'ashon's scholars agree with them entirely, and consider the agreement the most damning thing they can say.

THE WITNESSED FIRE — SARPHON (FIRE) × HARBAN (WAR)

A siege ended with a quarter of a city burned, and every soldier who died in it died in Harban's sight, and the fire distinguished none of them from the civilians it took in the same hour. Harban's stones were found on eleven of the bodies. Sarphon's priests note that the stones burned at exactly the rate the bodies did. Both traditions preserve the detail. Neither has ever explained why it is preserved.

OCCUPATION INDEX

Reverse lookup for drafting. Where two or more gods claim the same people, the collision is noted — those are scene material, not filing errors.

Who	Gods with standing	Collision
Quartermasters	Asaphon (the year's total), Tzaydon (the hunt that feeds), Sha'alon (the forced choice), Shalalon (the supply articles, if any)	A shortfall is simultaneously an entry, a miss, a decision, and sometimes a broken standard.
Magistrates	Kevodon (the name), Takanor (the form), Mishpaton (the rule), Koseb (the estate), Shalalon (the charter)	Form, rule, name, estate, and group standard can all claim one hearing.
Physicians	Rifon (the map of the body), Rabakhon (the birth entered), Chayelon (the chair)	The Map and the Chair. Systems repair vs social company over one bedside.
Soldiers	Harban (witnessed), Motiel (the coin), Shevuon (the personal oath), Neshakon (the blade), Goralon (the lot), Shalalon (company articles)	Personal swear and company standard are different Spades; neither softens the other.
Engineers / builders / makers	Tzuron (the measurement), Chakamon (the inherited instruction), Harashon (craft within the medium), Yetziron (variation), Shorash (whether it runs)	Measure vs make vs remix. Pattern-book and folk shop both claim Harashon. Shorash asks only whether the thing functions — a question none of the other four has ever required an answer to.
Merchants / bankers	Ashiron (balance), Chalufon (the unclosed favor), Heteron (the exception)	A gift is either an open account or an entry.
Farmers / field hands	Zerael (the seed), Qayitzon (the rate), Asaphon (the count), Aravon (the unweeded patch)	Aravon requires ground Asaphon cannot enter.
Scouts / cartographers	Taturiel (the first step), Sharaq (the road), Ya'aron (the terrain), Aretzon (the claim)	The Unclaimed Ridge.
Lovers / couples	Ahavel (the bond), Chadashiel (the new feeling), Sodiell (the kept thing), Takshiton (the gift), Demahel (the unspoken), Pituyel (the wanting)	Six Hearts, six different boundaries around the same two people.
Households / hosts	Tzelahar (the fire and the place set), Yaladiel (the birth door), Chayelon (the sickroom chair), Shalalon (billet articles)	The Guest Under Articles. House law vs city standard vs bedside vs birth.
Families settling estates	Koseb (the account), Kevodon (the name read), Rabakhon (the line)
Performers / courtiers	Shevachiel (the room's attention), Pituyel (the wanting)	Peak attention vs the door opened from within.
Marsh / scavenger communities	Bitzon (what already grows), Riqqavon (what won't stop), Chakamon (inherited machinery)	The burn rule exists because the first two are hard to tell apart.
Airship pilots	Qorathiel (ice), Bohuel (strain), Sharaq (the current), Tohuel (the Seam)	The only occupation with standing to both Wild Cards.
Apprentices	Tza'iron (permitted to abandon), Chakamon (copy before touching),	The Staked Span. Shop vs ledger vs optionality.

Who	Gods with standing	Collision
	Tzuron (the number), Harashon (the medium's rules)
Smugglers / poachers	Aromon (improvisation), Derorel (the fence), Heteron (the arrangement)
Brewers / tavern-keepers	Yayinon (the first cup), Chalufon (the favor), Aravon (the festival out of hand), Tzelahar (the house fire, if the tavern is one)
Charter officers / guild stewards	Shalalon (the standard), Shevuon (personal swears under it), Takanor (the form), Kevodon (the name on the roll)	The Word and the Standard.

STORY-READY

The dozen most likely to carry a scene as written, with what each one is for:

- Chayelon — the miscollapse that hurts most; a god of health who can only supply company.
 - Kevodon — honor with the affection removed by four centuries of magistrates, and a minority text that remembers.
 - Goralon — permadeath as liturgy; the third throw nobody records.
 - Aritzon — total power gone quiet; the one advisor who spoke, and no priesthood obliged to explain it.
 - Chakamon — the warmest thing in the coldest suit, and the only god who teaches.
 - Sodiel — exactly two people, and a child who didn't understand what was heard.
 - Motiel — manners assigned to death by people who needed them; the coin held backward.
 - Bitzon — the house on stilts; the only gift-parable that's also a defeat.
 - Tzelahar — the household we; guest-right as house honor; the place set through winter.
 - Shalalon — the peace that would not reopen; group standards with no private patch.
 - Kefiron — a correct reading that didn't take.
 - Bohuel — the patched seam, and the thought no version follows.
 - Tohuel — a builder who hasn't built in living memory, and cults too contradictory to hold her still.
 - Rifon — the map that was right; body as system, bedside elsewhere.
 - Shorash — eleven years of dispute ending in an afternoon nobody can describe; the only entity in the file who doesn't need to be believed in to keep working.
-

CHANGES FROM THE PREVIOUS VERSION

Grammar. Each suit now resolves in its own sentence shape. The not-X-just-Y construction is Spades-only (13 uses, down from ~35 across all suits) — it is a player explaining a restriction, which is what hard mode is. "Faintly" removed entirely (was 14). "The only Diamond who..." superlatives retired (was 9); they were compensating for flatness the fit-calibration now handles.

Fit. Miscollapses retained where still load-bearing — Harban, Motiel (Spades); Demahel, Midvaron, Chayelon (Hearts); Kevodon, Rabakhon, Rifon (Diamonds); Zerael (Clubs); Harashon now (seam) (pattern-book vs folk shop). Evidentiary mechanisms vary: minority text, cross-suit comparison, practice that outlived rationale, artifact with a missing piece.

Rank 6 rework. Axis set to Mode within rules. Seats retitled: Wealth → Covenant (Shalalon), Beauty → Hearth (Tzelahar kept; hospitality as tenant), Healing kept and cold-glossed as body-as-system repair (Rifon; scarcity drift secondary), Architecture → Crafting (Harashon from hrš; retired theonym Bonahel; large-build as tenant). Shevuon fenced as personal/moral oath vs group standard. Rabakhon marked as replication cousin to Rifon. Design lines added on rank 6 and key fences. Shared parables and occupation index updated.

Mountains renamed. Hararon → Tzuron (S-W-R, tzur — rock/mountain-fastness), resolving a spelling collision with Harashon. Harashon kept its original spelling by preference.

Collisions repaired (earlier). Takanor's flood now produces nothing at all; Kefiron keeps the monstrous outcome plus the line that no amendment would have prevented it. Three of four record-is-reality parables replaced. Read-aloud worship cut from six to two. Clubs' six interchangeable restless gods differentiated by what each is building.

Grace ratio raised from ~15% to ~35%: Kochon, Shevuon, Chayelon, Takshiton, Yaladiel, Bitzon, Derorel, Zerael, Yayinon, Chakamon, Sharaq, Aromon, Taturiel, Tzelahar (hearth), Harashon (craft) now carry gift-stories or endings that aren't only punishments.

Seven anomalies seeded — Qorathiel, Aritzon, Midvaron, Ashiron, Kefiron, Riqqavon, and (implicitly) Bohuel's mended hull. Each is inexplicable in its own god's mode, none are attributed, and no priesthood with an obligation to explain them exists.

Shorash added — mortal-facing entry for "the 55th," matching the fit-tag/Design conventions (no fit-tag applies to her; explained inline). Full mechanic stays in four-pantheons-roster.md.

Semitic roots added to every header — matching four-pantheons-roster.md's

Name/Root/Meaning columns, and a dedicated Fit-Tag Definitions block added to Method so clean/seam/miscollapse don't rely on a reader remembering prose from earlier in the document.

Structural additions: grid table, suit-first organization, shared parables, occupation index, story-ready list, Design field (rolling out; rank 6 first).

OPEN THREADS

- Sha'alon's Executioners sub-cult. Now a pure filing question, per the settled theology. The Necessary Verdict is a better argument for keeping the broadened portfolio than the original thread was.
- Mishpaton's exchanged-claims worship may be too strong for one god. Consider promoting it to general guild-court practice and giving him something narrower.
- Bohuel's parable follows a thought nobody in-world completes — that the Seam is the largest patched thing there is, and he finds strain. Whether any character is ever allowed to finish that sentence is a major structural decision and probably a late-series one.
- Design rollout. Rank 6 and key fences (Shevuon, Rabakhon) have Design lines. Extend the same short template to all 52 + wild cards so every seat is viewed as intended.
- Festivals is still missing. Nothing in the 52 covers communal celebration as its own concept — Yayinon (Alcohol) only gets the excess, not the institution, and Tzelahar's Hearth entry explicitly declines it ("Not Festival as primary domain"). The old pre-grid roster had this as Chagavel, Hearts, "The Managed Truce." Leaning Hearts if it ever gets a slot, but no card has been sacrificed for it yet.
- Format. If retitling sweeps become frequent, migrate to `_data/pantheon.yml` with templates generating grid / suit / rank / index views. Keep markdown as the authoring surface — YAML is a poor place to draft prose.